Consequently, these weak and isolated stakeholders might have to more or less submit to corporate actions because they lack power, legitimacy and urgency from the conventional perspective, as empirically demonstrated by research, including that of Banerjee and Bonnefous. The classic perspective also tends to ultimately leave responsibility that exceeds legal compliance to actors outside the organization. Heikkurinen and Ketola, This is because even though a firm itself takes responsibility for an initiative, it still ultimately requires a response from the marketplace that contributes to the traditional economic aims of the corporation. Heikkurinen and Bonnedahl, In other words, consideration for others must pay off somehow, or at least not adversely affect the bottom line.
